Part II: Utterances and Notes

- bóshì, shuòshì, xuéshì: doctor, master, bachelor diànnǎo bóshì	computer science at the doctoral level

huàxué bóshì	chemistry at the doctoral level
wùlǐ shuòshì	physics at the Master's level
wénxué shuòshì	literature at the Master's level
zhéxué bóshì	philosophy at the doctoral level

The phrases above are acceptable. But diànnǎo xuéshì is not often said.

- 'kàn' in 'kàn méi wèntí' originally means 'reading'. In Chinese 'kàn' is often used as 'to read', e.g. 'kàn shū' (to read books), 'kàn bào' (to read newspapers)
- 'niàn' originally means 'to read aloud' as in 'niàn shū' which means 'to read aloud'. It is also used to refer to 'study' as in 'wǒ zài zhèlǐ niàn shū' (study here).
- 'gēn ...' means 'with ...' It is always placed before the verb as a prepositional phrase in Chinese. Note that the prepositional phrase is usually placed after the verb, e.g. We do business with China. This is an important feature of the Chinese language.
- 'Zhōngguó yě cháng yǒu rén dào wǒmen gōngsī lái.' The direct translation would be: China also often has somebody to come to our company. It actually means: Somebody from China often comes to our company.
- 'Yǒu de huà hái tīng bu dǒng.' There is no subject here in this sentence. The subject is understood: 'I', I still don't understand some words. This is a typical Chinese sentence construction. Some people call it 'object fronting construction' and some people consider that 'yǒu de huà' is a topic. Subject dropping is very common in Chinese, particularly in a discourse.
- 'ne' in 'Zài zhèlǐ niàn shénme ne?' is just a particle to soften the mood. More examples are: Nǐ shì zuò shénme de ne? Nǐ shì cóng nǎlǐ lái de ne? Compared to Nǐ shì zuò shénme de? and Nǐ shì cóng nǎlǐ lái de?, the questions with 'ne' are softer, not that direct and categorical.
- 'shí jǐ ge rén' is a vague number or an approximate number. It means more than ten, but fewer than twenty.
- 'bù gǎndāng' is a routine expression to respond to somebody's compliment. It literally means: I don't dare to deserve it. Please note that there is a social etiquette in Chinese which changes in different situations.
